ABOUT TEA AND TRAINING

Certified Tea Specialist

T. Elizabeth Atteberry, born with the initials T.E.A., might have seemed destined to own a tea company. In truth, she always loved tea—a challenge since she lives in the coffee capital of the world, Seattle, where any tea lover must either submit to the bean or develop a lot of answers to “Tea? How can you drink that here!?”

She has over 15 years training experience and offers classes in black, green, oolong and white tea tasting, as well as an overview that is perfect for tea drinkers or restaurant professionals.

We were lucky enough to attend one of Expedition Tea Company's tea tasting classes. We learned so much about tea, tea quality and the history of tea. It was an amazing experience for us and one that has totally changed our appreciation of tea. We came away with a lot of knowledge and several nice teas.

Tea, Tay, Thay, Cha, Chai, Chaya, Tsai . . . No matter what you might call it, you are drinking an infusion made from the leaves of a particular camellia bush—the Camellia Sinensis.

The four main categories of tea include: white, green, oolong, black—classified by the way the leaves are processed. In the U.S., black tea is the most popular, with green tea running a close second. White tea is still fairly expensive and so delicate that it can be difficult to appreciate. Oolong teas—from the Chinese “Wu Long” meaning black dragon—are becoming more popular as people discover their wonderful complexity.

Within these four categories, there are a myriad of variations with fancy names, shapes, flavors, and aromas.
